Terra Teratalogica
Nathalie Anderson

After Ca\ius Julius Solinus: C. Iulii Solini Polyhistor, Rerum Tote Orbe Memorabilium thesaurus locupletissimus, Basel, 1543.

My Dearest Doctor Dee: If it’s not one Thing it’ll be another. North, at the curling lip of the Mare Congelatum, the frozen sea, it’s Anthropophagi, who’d as soon swallow you as talk with you at table. South, where the mountains sweat to float the Nile, it’s Troglo\odytæ, cave-things, wild to bury you. Terra es, terram ibis: you’re dirt to them; they’ll speed to spade you under. Go East? The worms they raise in Sym and Seres sup on forests, bolt men whole.
And in the West, the honeyed lands? Doctor, consider the bees.

By sea, no safer. Off Madagascar it’s Gorgones.
Elsewhere a mapmaker, at a loss for proper names, looks to sketch the danger: sinuous seas looped and knotted, ships gripped to the rigging, oceans reared up badger-faced and spewing oceans. Earth shakes. Ships sink. No such thing as terra firma. Still, my invitation stands. Are you with me, Doctor Dee? The towering twinned columns of Alexandria are fallen, the altars of Caesar overturned. In Arabia Deserta – steeped so deep in incense once, they called it “felix,” happy – the sands hunch now like great cats, slink and pounce like cats, watch – ocelis – with cats’ eyes.
Even the kittens bare their claws. When the hand of every Thing is turned against you, it’s no time to show your own hand. That’s why I live in terra incognito, where every bush is bladed, every coast is cleared, and every strange Thing held at bay. I urge you, Doctor: leave Samara on the Volga, leave Samarra on the Tigris, leave Samartia on the Black Sea, leave Samaria and Samarkand behind. Here, what we have is newer, cleaner, emptier. See for yourself: my door is open for you; my house is your house; my terra is your terra.

(Terra es, terram ibis: “Dust thou art, to dust thou shalt return.”)
